GRANDPA LUKE AND CALEB

Grandpa Luke had Hope in God giving him instructions on how to be a good provider for his family. This excerpt shows that he was a strong willed man who planned for the future of his family.

My grandfather was a very stern man. He didn't allow any cooking on Sundays; all cooking had to be done on Saturdays. Grandma Louise was a good cook, but some said that Grandpa Luke's cooking was better. He usually was the one who did the cooking on Saturdays.

Grandpa Luke couldn't afford a car, so most of the transportation was done by walking or catching the Fairfax trolley that linked Fairfax, Vienna, and Ballston with downtown Washington, D.C. At this location, the railway built a car barn, rail yard, workshops, electrical substation, and a general office. Grandpa Luke and her older brothers, John, Stephen, and Thomas worked there.

Grandpa Luke was a bricklayer and a good provider, even with so many children. He was a living example of loving-kindness with our neighbors. My mother said even though they didn't have much, Grandpa Luke made sure that no one went hungry in their neighborhood.
